PREFACE

THIS second edition of Population and Its Distribution has been published with the purpose of making it even more useful to our clients than the edition published in 1912. To accomplish this we have added several new features to assist in making possible a more thorough and detailed study of sales areas and a more satisfactory analysis of advertising in relation to such areas. A complete list of these new features, together with that of the other material, will be found in the Table of Contents.

Wherever available the latest estimates of population made by the Bureau of Census have been incorporated. These estimates are for 1916. They cannot be regarded as having the same degree of accuracy as the statistics of the last decennial census in 1910, but for all practical purposes we believe them thoroughly reliable.

Unless specifically indicated to the contrary we have observed the following rules in giving statistics of population:

1. The Bureau of Census estimates for 1916 have been given for the population of continental United States, for divisions of states, for all cities of 10,000 inhabitants or more.
2. For all cities and towns of less than 10,000 and more than 500 inhabitants, the figures have been taken from the Census of 1910.
3. Percentages for the total population of divisions, states and cities of 10,000 or more inhabitants have been computed on the basis of the new estimates, but all percentages affecting cities or towns of less than 10,000 inhabitants have been on the basis of the Census of 1910.

The statistics showing the distribution of wholesale and retail dealers have been compiled from the most reliable sources available. The figures given are taken from actual lists in the different trades, from statistics of the Internal Revenue office and from city directories. Even the best of the lists vary so greatly, however, that they can be considered only as estimates with many elements of uncertainty beyond our control. We believe them accurate enough, however, to be of sufficient service to justify their publication.

We hope that the usefulness of Population and Its Distribution will be greatly increased by this new edition.

The future of large-scale production can be assured only by large-scale selling

ONE of the most important facts of the economic history of the United States is the rapid development of manufactures during the last quarter of the 19th century and its culmination in large-scale production.

Everything seemed to contribute to the momentum and magnitude of this development. The turmoil of slavery and sectional strife that had been the curse of the country for half a century had spent itself on the bloody battlefields of the Civil War. The latent forces of a united nation awoke to life and needed only to be directed to production by the future captains of industry.

Capital, both British and American, that had been frightened away by the uncertainties of the sixties and early seventies now returned and could be obtained for the asking. The supply of labor was being constantly increased by the large number of Irish and German immigrants. Raw materials could be had from the growing West in whatever quantities they were demanded. Railways, interstate and transcontinental—built during the seventies and eighties with a rapidity and enthusiasm that remain without a parallel in our history—assured to the manufacturer a steady flow of raw materials to his factory and the delivery of his products to consumers. High protective tariffs, inherited from the financial legislation of the Civil War, became an established policy which gave to the manufacturer a monopoly of a market almost unrivalled in extent and in possibilities of development. Capital, labor, raw materials, transportation, protection, all stood ready as aids to move forward at the word of command.

It remained therefore for the manufacturer to seize the rare opportunity which such a combination of favoring forces offered him. His success could be challenged only by a fellow American manufacturer—a competitor who could outwit him and snatch the larger rewards from his hands.

Under the stimulus of the large rewards which such an opportunity offered and under the incentive which strong domestic competition created, the American manufacturer brought to bear upon the problem of production a very high degree of intelligence. With utmost care he kept abreast of every mechanical invention. The investment necessary to install in his factory any invention which still further reduced costs, he made without hesitation. Likewise factory organization, labor problems, sources of raw materials, anything and everything in fact which bore upon production and upon the reduction of its costs, received intelligent study.

It was by this intelligent study that the American manufacturer prospered and wrought by the beginning of the twentieth century what amounted to nothing less than an industrial revolution—a revolution that marked the rise of large-scale production—making commodities by the millions and making them at the lowest cost. And the hungry market absorbed the rapidly flowing output. It seemed that there was nothing more to do than continue to turn out upon this hungry market all that factories could produce.

But a strange thing happened! Machines perfected by inventors and pressed for maximum production, began to make goods faster than the markets absorbed them! This seemed strange indeed, when every census, state and federal, showed that the population was increasing rapidly and that the country was growing in every way. Evidently the failure of demand to keep pace with maximum production was not due to the lack of a potential market, but to some other reason. And what was that reason?

Manufacturers had concentrated their attention almost entirely upon production. They had neglected to devote the same high intelligence to the problems of distribution and selling. This was all very well so long as large-scale production was attained only by the few who could find ready markets for all they produced. But by 1900 large-scale production was no longer a monopoly of the few, it had become "standardized", which means that the latest inventions in machinery, the supply of adequate capital, the necessary quota of workers, in short all the factors essential to large-scale production, were at the command of all. No wonder that factories began to turn out products faster than the market absorbed them, for the market had not been prepared in advance to absorb their rapidly increasing quantities.

Some few manufacturers were shrewd enough to see the change that had taken place. They saw that large-scale production was no longer their sole, or even their most important problem, but that large-scale selling, as yet little understood, offered the new and critical field upon which the battle of competition was to be fought. They turned to find the means of creating a wider demand for their products.

As machines had multiplied enormously the productiveness of man-power in manufacturing, so must man-power be made more productive in selling. An attempt at large-scale selling by merely increasing the number of men, would be prohibitive in both time and cost. Means must be found of reaching purchasers and making purchasers by the thousands and by the millions.

It was evident that no matter through how many channels the distribution of a product might lead, the ultimate success of the product depended, not upon the dealer whose interest was in profit, but upon the purchaser whose interest was in the merit of the article itself. With rare foresight the few manufacturers recognized in newspapers, magazines, direct mail, and in display, the most efficient and economical means of carrying a message.

In advertising they found the economies of large-scale selling.

Advertising was not new. Millions of dollars were already being spent annually on advertising. Advertising agencies were already driving a thrifty trade. But it was not until the period after 1900 that advertising came to claim recognition as one of the most vital and most essential forces in modern industrial life. The conspicuous success of the few manufacturers who had had the wisdom to recognize this and act upon it, had begun to convert a larger number to follow their example when the Great War broke upon us.

The war from its beginning in 1914 created a demand which American manufacturers could not fully meet until they had enlarged their plants to double and triple their former size.

Even after four years of war the hungry market again, as in the earlier days of large-scale production, is absorbing all that the factories working at maximum speed can produce. The attention of many manufacturers is again concentrated primarily upon the problem of large-scale production.

But the war must end and the abnormal, gluttonous demand of war-time needs must cease. Government contracts will no longer care for the output of factories. Then manufacturers will be thrown upon their own initiative to see that their power of large-scale production shall not become a liability instead of an asset.

As never before these manufacturers must concentrate upon the problem of distribution and selling.

Scientific methods must be applied to large-scale selling as they have been to large-scale production. In large-scale production, the method has been everything, but in selling, except in few cases, method has counted for little.

The laws which govern selling will be found to be just as definite as those which govern manufacturing; but they must be approached and studied with that same degree of intelligence, which, as applied to production, has made the American manufacturer famous throughout the world. Nothing short of this will safeguard the future from failure and disappointment.

Advertising holds the key to the problem. But it must be based upon thorough knowledge.

There are many special facts which must be known in the study of every given problem. But common to every problem is the necessity of knowing all the possible markets. To visualize, in the most convenient form, the distribution of population, as it constitutes markets, the accompanying pages are published.
